"To actually achieve good medical outcomes for patients, doctors have to be free to challenge difficult problems that patients might seek to avoid, such as "excess weight, excess alcohol, dangers of sexual behaviours – at the very least to tell medical truth", he said.

We have to protect the right for freedom of the individual to be and strive to learn honestly through integrity and accountability. We are already looking at some significant disconnection which would undermine the regard for good will between individuals and instead encourage fear and division between people requiring healthful practices. Relationships with room to build new and let go of previous understandings is the way forward.
