The medical board of Australia

Regarding the regulation of skin cancer practitioners. I wish to have it know that under the Royal Australian College of General Practitioners special skills module, skin cancer medicine was an elective approved by the college.

Training facilities were inspected and approved by the RACGP. I received formal training in this field of medicine over a 12 month period. I would hope that this qualification is recognised by the medical board, in so much that no further qualification is necessary.

I bring this to the attention of the medical board since there are very few general practitioners that hold such a special skills qualification approved by the RACGP.
